FUND MANAGER COMMENTARY AT 30 SEP 2025

Global markets in September were shaped by policy decisions, shifting economic data, and political developments. In the US, the Federal Reserve (Fed) delivered a 25-bpt rate cut, reinforcing its data-dependent stance. Consumer spending remained resilient, inflation prints were broadly in line with expectations, and equities delivered mixed results. Technology sectors held firm, while energy underperformed as oil prices reversed earlier gains. The looming risk of a US government shutdown added uncertainty, driving safe-haven flows into gold and contributing to volatility in bond markets, where the yield curve steepened. In Europe, the European Central Bank (ECB) maintained policy rates, reflecting comfort with inflation near target. Services activity improved, offsetting softer manufacturing data, and equity indices posted modest gains. Defensive sectors and healthcare provided support, while energy weakened in line with commodity moves. Political and fiscal concerns remained, but stable policy settings underpinned sentiment. China presented a mixed picture. Official manufacturing activity remained just below expansion, while private surveys pointed to stronger export demand. Services slowed marginally, and the central bank held lending rates steady, preferring targeted measures over broad stimulus. In South Africa, the South African Reserve Bank kept the repo rate at 7%. Inflation eased slightly, aided by softer food and fuel costs, while equities advanced on the back of resource sector strength. The portfolio outperformed its benchmark and peers, supported by our overweight position in local South African assets, which delivered strong relative returns.
